

Preface

Floodings is one of the natural disasters, presently recognized as the non traditional threat, that Thailand in the year 2011 had encountered with its greatly tremendous affects compared with the past ones, though receiving various assistances coming from government, armed forces, and private and general public sectors. These assistances could actually help alleviate the peoples' grievances for some levels. Although each agency seperately functioned within sphere of one own authority effectively; however, if there were some cooperations within the scope and concept of "joint operations" among armed forces as well as with private and general publics, they should gradually yeild some effective results to prevent and solve non traditional threats, especially the great floodings that were seen in the past. So, the creation of capabilities of sectors concerned to well aware of the importance of the "joint operations" among government, armed forces, and private and general publics should be emphasized as one phase of the the security revolutions.

Hence, this case- study paper aims to point to the involvement of armed forces' assistance in the disaster relief operations, with purposes of increasing the joint operations among government, armed forces, and private and general publics, widely recognized as one of the security revolutions in the future effectively.

Strategic Studies Center
National Defence Studies Institute

